It is the .Q: Using a nested set function to select a row from a table in a sqlalchemy join query I have a SQLAlchemy query where I have a join to a table and want to keep everything in one query. I have the following query which works fine: rows = session.query(Row.id, join((Dependency, Dependency, relation), on=(Table.id == Depedency.relation),).filter(isinstance(Table.relation, ForeignKey) and Table.id == Table.id)).join(Table).all() This is simple and quick to write. But I want to make it better and keep it all in the query. I was able to do this using the second argument for first() and all(nested=True) however this appears to break the entire query as it returns no results. What am I doing wrong? A: In your on clause, both Join objects should be strings like (Row.id == Depedency.relation). In fact, the following clause would have the same effect: join((Dependency, Depedency.relation), on=("%s' == Depedency.relation), The last line should do the same thing as your query. You can also use __ in the column expression, which is called the __table__ attribute. For example: joined_rows = session.query(Row.id, join(("%s' == joined_rows.c.__table__.id)).all() Medical interventions in
